

---

Rock and Mountain Climbing Equipment

Contributed by Jonah Krimmer
Thursday, 02 November 2006

What do you like to do in your spare time? I'm talking about your favorite hobbies that just can't be avoided. Maybe you're into sports, or woodworking. Does deep sea fishing or possibly even hang gliding fill up your free time? One of my favorite past times is rock climbing. Believe it or not, my sibling got me hooked on the concept. If you're not into this extreme sport, then you may have just not had a proper introduction. This is not a crazy, death defying adrenaline junkie craze. Well, I guess it could be if you made it that way. However, rock climbing can be a wonderful and relaxing experience that's great for the body. Once you've acquired the skills, you simply need to find the right climbing equipment.

Back when I was in jr. high, I watched my brother run down the side of a farm silo. This was certainly amazing in my eyes. Man did it look scary, yet exciting. He was an airborne ranger in the army back then, and the feat was nothing to him. He had repelled and jumped out of airplanes a number of times. This was the first time I had ever witnessed repelling where the repeller faces the ground instead of facing the sky. It was impressive.

After seeing this, I wanted to learn how to repel too. Sure enough, my older brother obliged. I was repelling like a pro in no time. The hard part was actually dealing with the harness setup. That took a while to master. He even gave me some decent climbing equipment to get started. It wasn't long before I took up rock climbing and enjoyed repelling down any crazy place I could find on our 15 acres of country land. I eventually evolved to the finest climbing equipment as I reached adulthood.

Have you ever tried rock climbing or repelling? This truly is a good skill to have. It could get you out of a nasty jam one day. If you're interested in giving this hobby a shot, hop online today. You can easily be introduced to the world of professional rock climbing and repelling. The Internet is the best place to locate quality climbing equipment. Check out some of the wonderful outdoor and sporting goods sites that offer the finest climbing equipment for the lowest prices. It's all on the World-Wide-Web these days.